Preoperative parathyroid hormone as an indicator of recurrence following parathyroidectomy for primary hyperparathyroidism: a retrospective case-control study. Primary hyperparathyroidism

(PHPT) is a common endocrine condition. The present study aimed to determine whether serum parathyroid hormone (PTH) levels could help predict recurrence following parathyroidectomy (PTX) for primary hyperparathyroidism (PHPT). A retrospective case-control study was conducted to assess the predictive role of the preoperative PTH level for the development of post-PTX complications in PHPT. A total of 431 consecutive patients who underwent PTX for PHPT were enrolled in this study.

The outcomes of interest were defined as the development of total serum calcium more than 10mg/dl (total serum calcium ≥ 10.2 mg/dl) and the increase in the PTH level (iPTH) more than 50pg/ml (iPTH ≥ 50 pg/ml). The cases and controls were matched according to age, sex, and preoperative Ca and P levels. Univariate and multivariate logistic regression analysis was used to investigate the predictive role of PTH level. Of the 431 patients, 197 (45.0%) developed post-PTX complications; these included 25 (5.7%) patients with Ca levels more than 10.2mg/dl, and 22 (5.1%) patients with iPTH levels more than 50pg/ml. The risk of post-PTX complications was significantly higher in patients with high iPTH levels (iPTH ≥ 50 pg/ml) than in patients with low iPTH levels (iPTH
